in extended deterrence, defined as the threat of force to protect allies and friends, rather than "central" or "homeland" deterrence.³ This focus on extended deterrence—and especially on the role of deterrence by denial in extended deterrence—highlights the central importance of protecting territory from attack and invasion.

Conventional Deterrence in the Second Nuclear Age

The question is not whether deterrence policies can or cannot work in the second nuclear age; that they can under the proper conditions is clear. Rather, the question is whether deterrence policies can be made to work with the degree of predictability and reliability claimed by U.S. officials, or at least with a predictability that provides U.S. ...
